The importance of this game on the other side of the Atlantic may be inferred from the fact that in the Gelic Athletic Association of Ireland there are seven-teen hundred hurling clubs. Each club must have a membership of at least twenty-one active players, for that is the regulation number of men to a side in championship matches. This tremen-dous league manages to discover the champion club every year, and at this time the season of play is in full blast. As it would take several years of constant playing to play every team in the seventeen hundred against every other, and under the cross bar; if the ball goes the association has adopted a system of over the bar or over the goal line besubordinate matches in order to eliminate from the "All Ireland" championship contests such clubs, and that means the ball crosses the goal line outside the the great majority, as would have no hope of winning. The Stuart Exhibition is provoking a discussion in London regarding the proper mode of spelling the name of the Royal House. It is, perhaps, not generally known that up till the time of Mary Queen of Scots it was always spelt Stewart, the name having been derived from the office of High Steward of Scotland. The unfortunate Queen Mary had con-tracted the habit at the French Court of turning Stewart into a French word, and spelling it Stuart (there being no w in rench). A century later, after the re-volution of 1688, the Royal House lived so entirely at France that the French mode of spelling the name became and still is very generally adopted.
